Description:

Research projects are always designed individually, tailored to the interests of the student and the expertise of the supervisor. Most basic research projects are located in the areas of the attention, cognition, action control, creativity, and self-representation, whereas applied research projects often address drug effects, cognitive effects of religion, decision-making, risk, and safety issues. Most staff members of the Cognitive Psychology Unit are available as supervisors.

The research projects commonly cover a whole semester, but other durations are possible. The exact content of the project and duration needs to be determined in consultation with the Research Project Supervisor.
